

CONTRIBUTORS

VICKY HWANG is completing an MA in East Asian Studies at Stanford University. She previously earned a BSFS from the School of Foreign Service, Georgetown University and is primarily interested in Hong Kong-Mainland China relations, as well as Chinese foreign policy.

KHAN PYO LEE is pursuing a PhD at the Guanghua School of Management, Peking University. He received his BA in Asian History and MBA from Seoul National University. His research interests include China's industrial restructuring and inter-firm relations. In 2003, his paper "Management Control and Performance of Korea-Chinese Joint Ventures in China" (coauthored with Dong-Khee Rhee and Yong-Gon Cho) was published in the Korea Trade Review.

RYAN ONG is an MA student at the School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS), The Johns Hopkins University. He received his BA in International Studies and Biology from the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill. His main research interest is the political development of China, on both the macro and grassroots levels.

SIMONA BIGNAMI-VAN ASSCHE is completing a PhD in Demography at the University of Pennsylvania. She had previously received her MsC in Demography from the London School of Economics and a BA from Luigi Bocconi University, Italy. She is primarily interested in demographic data collection in less developed countries; health measurement and evaluation; as well as disease modeling and forecasting, with a particular focus on HIV/AIDS. Her publications include "An Assessment of the KDICP and MDICP Data Quality: Sample Attrition, Interviewers' Effects and Questions' Reliability" (with Georges Reniers and Alex Weinreb), and "Are We Measuring What We Want to Measure? An Analysis of Individual Consistency in Survey Response in Rural Malawi," both published in 2003 in Demographic Research. Her article was presented at the 2002 Graduate Conference of the Harvard East Asia Society.

ROBIN ORLANSKY is a PhD student in Asian and Middle Eastern Studies at the University of Pennsylvania. She received her BA in East Asian Languages and Cultures from The University of Chicago in 2001 and is primarily interested in women's issues in contemporary Japan. During 2001-02 she taught English in the Iwate Prefecture as part of the JET (Japan Exchange and Teaching) Program.

CAMELIA NAKAGAWARA is a PhD student in East Asian Languages and Cultures at The University of Chicago. She has received an MA in TESOL (Teaching English to Speakers of Other Languages) from Teachers College, Columbia University and an MA in Chinese and English from the University of Bucharest, Romania. She has a number of previous publications, including "The Dialectic of the Family in Ozu Yasujiro's Tokyo Story" and "Itami Juzo's Tampopo – A Parable of Learning," both published in the Toyo Ewa College Journal (1996 and 1994, respectively). Her research interests revolve around the notion of space and the meaning of stones and water in Japanese gardens.

DAVID S. LEE is currently completing a joint degree program with the UCLA School of Law and Harvard University and expects to earn his JD and AM in Regional Studies – East Asia in 2006. He has previously earned a BA in International Politics and Asian Studies from Brigham Young University and is primarily interested in the study of human rights and international law, as well as contemporary developments in Northeast Asia. A James West Fellowship funded fieldwork in Seoul for his article during the summer and fall of 2003.

GEORGE BAYLON RADICS is currently a graduate student in the Department of Sociology at the National University of Singapore. He earned a BA in Sociology and Asian American Studies from UCLA. His research interests include development studies, post-colonial theory, militarization issues, and Southeast Asia. His article was presented at a 2003 graduate student seminar in the Department of Sociology at the National University of Singapore and at the Southeast Asian Conflict Resolution Network Conference, "Issues and Challenges for Peace and Conflict Resolution in Southeast Asia," held in Penang, Malaysia in January 2004.