RESEARCH ACTIVITIES

Current Book Project: The Political Representation of the Poor

How do electoral rules affect the poor? When do parties have an incentive to seek the support of the low-income citizens? These questions motivate a broadly comparative analysis of the relationship between antipoverty policy and electoral rules. Drawing on contemporary survey research and historical census data, this project ties the different components of political representation – participation, partisan representation, and the policy-making process – to the electoral incentives legislators and political parties. Specifically, the geographic distributions of low-income voters and legislative seats across electoral districts shape legislators' and parties' incentives to be responsive to low-income citizens. In this way, the institutions that provide the democratic legitimacy of our governments also undermine opportunities for democratic equality. This project establishes the foundation of a research agenda motivated by broader questions about whether and how the institutions of contemporary democracies create incentives to build societies that reflect democratic ideals

Research contributing to this project was presented at the Princeton Conference on Partisanship in Princeton NJ, 26 September 2008, the Annual Meetings of the American Political Science Association (APSA), in Boston MA, 28-31 August 2008, European Consortium for Political Research Joint Sessions in Rennes, France, 11-16 April 2008, the Council for European Studies 16th International Conference in Chicago, 6-8 March 2008, the Forum on Contemporary Europe at Stanford University, 24 January 2008, the Texas A&M University Conference on Social Policy,
